Professor Portes’ research focuses on immigration to the United States and the factors affecting the socio-economic success of disadvantaged children of immigrants. He is also interested in the impact of immigrant transnational organizations and in the evolution of Latin American cities under the influence of neo-liberal adjustment policies. Author of more than two hundred articles and chapters on national development, economics, sociology, immigration, and urbanization, his latest project deals with the concept of "institutions" as currently used in economics and the ways in which sociological theory can improve and refine its uses in the field of development.
